The Lost Message of the Revolutionary

The Lost Message of the Revolutionary

The door was ajar, creaking slightly in the evening breeze. Inside, the room was in complete disarray—papers scattered, furniture overturned, and books strewn across the floor.

Emilia's breath caught. "This... this isn't right."

Tomás stepped forward cautiously, his gaze darting around the dimly lit room. "Someone's been here before us. And they were looking for something."

Emilia swallowed hard. "Or someone." A heightened tension settled over them both. What had they stumbled into? And more importantly—where was Señor Rivas?

Bolívar's Lightning-Fast Communication:

Did you know that messengers in Simón Bolívar's time traveled on horseback at incredible speeds? The fastest couriers could cover over 100 miles (160 km) in a day! Since there were no telephones or telegraphs yet, secret letters had to be carried by trusted riders or hidden inside everyday objects, like hollowed-out walking sticks or even baked inside loaves of bread!
